Excerpt: . . . monies to Iraq and the manner and means by which those monies were transferred. Second, a sting operation in a money laundering investigation uncovered foreign intelligence information about an attempt to transport night-vision goggles, infrared lights, and other sensitive military equipment to a foreign terrorist organization. The DoJ also provided a number of examples where intelligence information from a criminal investigation was appropriately shared with the Intelligence Community under 203(d). Some of these examples included ordinary domestic criminal investigations that discovered foreign intelligence information about violent terrorist training camps, plots to bomb soft targets abroad, an assassination plot, use of false travel documents, and logistical support networks for terrorist groups. The Director of the Central Intelligence Agency also spoke approvingly of the information sharing procedures promulgated under Section 203. He cited the National Counterterrorism Center (NCTC) as one of the most positive illustrations of the current collaborative environment created by Section 203. He noted that NCTC receives foreign intelligence information obtained by...
