Not illustrated. 1871 Excerpt: .thoroughly, pour the liquid into a beaker, and leave the flask inverted, in order that it may drain. Meanwhile pour 6 or 8 ex. of the diluted urine into a test-tube of 20 or 25 c.c. capacity, heat the liquid to boihng, and aferwards cool it quickly by immersing the tube in cold water. In case the precipitate produced by boiling is so slight that the form of objects placed in strong daylight can be distinguished on looking at them through the liquid, the sample has been too much diluted, and the operator will at once proceed to prepare a more concentrated solution by mixing 12 c.c. of the original urine with water in the 100 c.c. flask. But in case the first solution was not transparent, it may be tested in the trough. In testing, fill the trough two thirds full of the cold boiled liquid, and look through the liquid at the flame of a burning candle in a darkened room. Repeat the experiment with other diluted samples of the urine until a point is reached where the shape of the flame cannot be distinguished, and only diffused light can be seen through the liquid, even when the candle is brought close to the trough. In case the flame is visible through the first solution, the next trial must be made with a solution containing a few more per cents, of urine than the first. But if the shape of tho flame cannot be...
