Not illustrated. 1881 Excerpt: .with her forefinger, he merely expanded his powerful wings, and uttered a faint scream of pleasure. So, seeing how earnestly Koll wished her to do so, Ethel accepted the gift, and the bird was forthwith installed on the back of a kitchen chair, where he sat still and grim as death, watching with his great black eyes in silence. Then the old man seized Ethel s hand with trembling fingers, kissed it reverently, and, after some muttered words in Gaelic, went away. Ethel had accepted the gift with some readiness, because it had suddenly occurred to her that the real giver was not the old fisherman at all, but his foster-son. Yes, the hawk at least was worthy of Graham--just such a present as he might send. The cray-fish and the creel of mussels were in poor taste, but had perhaps been brought because the fisherman had been instructed to take up to the lodge whatever dainty came to his net, and had scarcely known how to discriminate when a young lady s appetite was in question. The more she thought it over the more convinced she became that all the presents came, directly or indirectly, from Graham. This made her delighted with the kestrel. When her father came home from shooting she took the bird on her wrist, hawking fashion, and carried it to him. It did not escape her fancy that, with all its prettiness, it belonged to a fierce, indomitable species, like Graham...
