Excerpt: .of the world, then it was not worth while for VWashington to do what he did, nor for the settlers of this country to do what they did. But is it true that Americans are mere material ists? If you look at their occupations, yes, I think I may say, without exaggeration, that there never has been a country in which there are so many opportunities of acquiring fortunes rapidly as this country has afforded. But is this the chief end, or is this the chief interest of America? If so, then very little has been permanently gained. Europe is far more interesting to the eye than America, and it is goingsto remain far more interesting-for many decades to come. It is to the American of to-day what Italy was to the Englishman of the Renaissance from the time of Surrey to the time of Milton. It is the home of the older associations of history, of the treasures of art; it is the place in which civic and social order are most highly developed, in which nature is made beautiful by the work of generations. In all these respects Europe is more interesting than America, and it must remain more interesting; but, is this the whole story? Is the story of the race written entirely in the achievements which the eye sees, which are expressed in terms of architecture, painting and sculpture? Has not our country the dramatic, I may say, the supreme...
